Come on out and play

Kids should be playing outdoors. Outdoor play and exercise are extremely important for a child's physical and mental development. To indulge in such activity, children need safe and easily accessible open spaces as close to home as possible in which they can romp about and create a world of their own. Especially in an urban setting, there is a growing need for owners' and housing associations to take the initiative. This does not necessarily mean that every playground should be huge and lavishly designed. Even in confined spaces, it is possible to adapt to the conditions of the location and install playground equipment that reflects the colours and shapes of the architecture of the surroundings. As an alternative, why not try setting up a common space where old and young alike get together? Surely, there are countless possibilities for creating recreation and meeting areas "right at your doorstep". This "show-stopper" will show you a few alternatives.

01

Small playing areas

There is space even in the smallest gap:
for having fun on a swing, balancing, climbing, discovering something new and, of course,
enjoying yourself.
